For those interested in diving much deeper into this analytical model, it is explained in much greater depth at the link below. For everyone else, you can look at the model score for each player to see where they are predicted to finish for fantasy.

Player Profile

Does everything slightly above average, but nothing at an elite level. He is not considered a true dual threat, but is a very capable runner when asked to do so or when needed in scramble scenarios. Playing in a simplified offensive system at Ole Miss helped to cover up some deficiencies as a processor, but he has plenty of tools that can be developed at the next level. It's difficult to picture him as more than a perennial backup, but if drafted to the right system he could provide a solid fantasy floor and earn a chance to be a long term NFL starter (a similar trajectory to Bo Nix).

Player Profile

A physically talented, dual-threat QB who has the prototypical build for the NFL. He is a high-level processor who excels in play-action with good eye discipline. He layers the ball well with good anticipation regardless of man or zone coverages. Struggles with pressure and lacks the arm strength to push the ball downfield with consistency. His tape also shows inconsistent ball placement, but this was masked due to elite separators at the wide receiver position. Profiles best as a late day two QB who could outperform his draft capital and be a long-term backup.

Player Profile

Luther Burden is a powerful slot receiver with excellent YAC ability. He plays with tenacity and is difficult to bring down in the open field, leading the FBS in missed tackles forced. His build and play strength makes him an effective blocker.

Burden does not have elite burst or quickness. He saw a lot of manufactured touches at Mizzou and didn't have an elaborate route tree. He tends to round his routes off and I don't see him as a great separator. Burden has some of the strongest hands in this class and has the versatility to be used in a number of roles at the NFL level.

Player Profile

It's hard to come up with any major red flags when watching Higgins' tape. He's your prototypical X receiver with the size and strength to win on the boundaries, especially at the catch point. Higgins has an uncanny ability to box out smaller DBs and high-point the football. He displays excellent body control and spatial awareness along the sidelines and in the endzone.

Higgins won't blow you away with his explosiveness or speed. He's an an average separator but doesn't need a ton of space to win. Higgins has the build and skill set to be a reliable WR2 at the NFL level in the right situation.

A powerful running back with great burst and acceleration that allows him to hit holes quickly and efficiently. He also has the ability to bounce the ball outside. Judkins has a compact frame that allows for good contact balance and he plays with a physicality that most others in this class don't possess. He lacks the long speed of an elite breakaway runner, but still can eclipse 20 mph. He has consistent, reliable hands out of the backfield, but could use some improvements as a pass protector.

Player Profile

Etienne is a reliable and productive between-the-tackles runner with good contact balance. His downhill running style and low pad level allow him to pick up yards after contact and finish runs strongly at the second level. He possesses great short-area quickness and good initial burst which creates a mismatch with linebackers, but lacks the long speed to be a true breakaway runner. He is very comfortable catching the ball out of the backfield and downfield but needs some improvement with both route tree and ability to get separation.

Player Profile

Harold Fannin Jr. is an undersized but highly effective receiving tight end. He has the ability to win at all levels. Fannin is a hands-catcher and has above-average athleticism and ball tracking abilities.

Fannin's quickness and speed is not a weakness, but given his size, it's not overly impressive. He's a competent run-blocker despite his smaller stature, and was rarely used in pass protection. Fannin can round off his routes at times. He is fairly elusive in the open field. The main concern is the lack of competition at BGSU, but Fannin performed well against Penn State and Texas A&M this season.

Player Profile

Gadsden is a converted tight end, originally playing wide receiver his freshman year for Syracuse. He's a highly athletic, lanky pass catcher with a full route tree and a natural ability to adjust to poorly thrown passes. Gadsden came into the Shrine Bowl bigger than expected, at 247 lbs, but his normal playing weight is likely thinner than this. Gadsden lacks some play strength after the catch, and while he's a polished route runner, he isn't very explosive out of his breaks. He puts in good effort as a run and pass blocker but can stand too upright and lose leverage at times. Gadsden's skillset is one that is extremely fantasy friendly - he's a vertical threat with excellent ball skills and a large catch radius.
